iii.	Members	Members of the guild are called collegiati .
iv.	Officials	The deceased bestiarius was the association's vixillarius, 'standard-bearer'.

iv. Status

Maximinus, the deceased, makes clear in his epitaph that he was a cives, a free Roman citizen.

XI. INTERACTION ii. Interaction abroad It is unclear whether this particular ludus was established at Sirmium, the homeland of the deceased, Thessaloniki, or elsewhere. It may have gathered members employed in wild-beast games all over the Balkans.

XII. NOTES

i.	Comments	<ul> <li>Collegium is not explicitly attested, but the text's formula (collegiatus [lud]i centinri) makes collegium ludi centinari a very probable name of the association.</li> <li>Whether we understand the term centenarius as meaning centurio or as an adjective denoting the years the school was in operation (see Nigdelis 2006: 243), it is clear that the term is part of the school's name, and hence of the name of the association.</li> <li>Alternatively, one could assume that the descriptive term for this guild of bestiarii and, presumably, gladiators was the ludus itself, the common term used for gladiatorial schools (private, imperial, or civic).</li> <li>This is the last mention of wild-beast games in Macedonia (Nigdelis 2006: 248), the last mention of an association in Macedonia (Nigdelis 2010: 19 n. 40), and the only source in Latin for a certain private association from Macedonia.</li> </ul>

i.	Private association	Probable
	Note	The school's international character, which seems to preclude that we are dealing with a civic school, and the absence of any elements allowing us to suppose that it was an imperial school, make it rather probable that we are dealing here with a private gladiatorial school.
