X. ACTIVITIES

iii. Worship	The Onitadai functioned as sacrificial butchers and cooks (μάγειροι, mageiroi) in the cult of Apollon Delphinios. They also provided the equipment for the slaughtering of the animals and the preparation of the meat. Having roasted the meat and baked sacrificial cakes they distributed and served the portions to the participants in the public sacrifice. They are in turn compensated with meat, the leftovers of the wine and sacrificial cakes and all the skins of the sacrificed animals.
Deities worshipped	Apollon Didymeus

XII. NOTES

i. Comments	The character of the Onitadai as well as that of similar Milesian associations involved in cults in Miletus (like the Skiridai [CAPInv. 1045] and Neleidai [CAPInv. -----]) and Didyma (like the Euangelidai [CAPInv. -----] or the Branchidai in the Archaic Period) is not completely clear. They are probably best seen as fictitious genos -like cult associations. The Onitadai seem to have traced its origin back to Onites, a mythical son of Heracles. It is, however, well possible that the common ancestry was a rather abstract concept and that the genos was not a 'family clan' in the narrow sense. Membership may still have been hereditary, but concrete information is lacking. Cf. on these problems with earlier literature Herda 2006: 124-33; Herda 2011: 61-2; also Fontenrose 1988: 77-8 (esp. on the Branchidai).
