στίβας, stibas (ll. 2-3). Marcus Sertorius Aristolykos has erected it for the association. The term could designate (especially in the famous inscription of the Iobakchoi) both a festival and an association, but its original meaning is more concrete: A bed of straw or flowers (cf. discussion by Jaccottet 2011: 423-30). In our case, it must refer to a building, perhaps a dining room. – Ramsay 1885: 138 (ed. pr.) supplemented στ[λει]δαν, stif[lei]dan, from στύλις, stylis, wall.

VII. ORGANIZATION

iv. Officials

The inscription is dated by reference to a tamias, but this is probably the civic official.

X. ACTIVITIES

iii. Worship

Petzl in I.Smyrna suggests that the designation Ganymedeitai refers to wine-drinking in a Dionysiac cult (cf. Ganymede as cup-bearer in Olympus). The Dionysiac connection is possible because of the word stibas, but it was not exclusively used in Dionysiac contexts (cf. the doubts expressed by Jaccottet 2003: 219). This would mean that the association did not worship Ganymede, which is, however, a possibility. Picard 1944: 154, n. 1 believed that "le Ganymède smyrniote était un génie bachique, voire un symbole de la conquête de l'éternité, en raison de son enlèvement au ciel"; this is making a lot out of nothing, given the fact that we have just the name. Finally, it should not be forgotten that Ganymedes is attested as a personal name in Smyrna (I.Smyrna 685), and that the philagrippai (I.Smyrna 331) would provide a local parallel for a personal name being used as the basis for an association's name.

Deities worshipped

Ganymede? Dionysos?

XIII. EVALUATION

i. Private association

Probable

Note

Although the religious context is debatable, it seems likely that this was a private association.

ii. Historical authenticity
