In 1. 17 is mention of "the Bakchikon" (τῷ βακχικῷ, to bakchiko). This is most probably the private sanctuary of the association (cf. Jaccottet 2003: 250).

Harland 2014: 350 (following Kloppenborg) understands this as a reference to the "Bacchic festival" but this is linguistically impossible.

iii.	Members	The members of the association are designated as συνβάκχοι, synbakchoi , "fellow bakchants" in 1. 16. The term clearly refers to the Dionysiac character of the association.
v.	Other staff	The inscriptions mentions musicians and cooks (μαγε[ιρκοὺς] ἐργάτας, mage[irkous] ergatas) who are involved in the festivities of the association but are obviously not themselves members of it.

ii.	Realty	The association receives a sum of money for the purchase "of the place adjacent to the Bakchikon" (l. 17-18: τοῦ προσκει[μένου] τῷ βακχικῷ τόπου, tou proskei[menou] to bakchiko topou). Its not clear for what purpose this land near the association's sanctuary should be used.
iii.	Income	The inscription lists several donations to the association, most probably from its members. They promise to provide wine, bread, cooks, and musicians. One member donates a sum of money to his fellow bakchants for the purchase of land.

ii.	Meetings and events	The association received donations that were obviously used for banquets, with wine, bread, meat and music, but no specifics are given.
iii.	Worship	The association is obviously devoted to Dionysos but nothing more specific about the cult activities can be said.
	Deities worshipped	Dionysos

i.	Comments	Since the inscription was discovered at Söke, the modern village between Priene and Magnesia on the Maeander, the ancient provenance of the text is not clear.

i. Private association Note Certain The terminology employed (synbakchoi) to describe the members of the association along with the cultic activities suggest a private association.
