i.b. Document(s) typology &amp; language/script	Various typologies of texts (dedications, honorific inscriptions in honour of the leader of the group, tesserae etc) either written in Greek or in Aramaic.
ii. Source(s) provenance	References to the priests of Bel or to their symposiarch were found in several places at Palmyra. A number of them comes from the temple of Bel, but other texts mentioned above come, e.g., from the temples of Baalshamin and of Allat.

VII. ORGANIZATION

ii. Leadership	The leader of the group appears to be defined as 𐤠𐤁 𐤌𐤓𐤕 in Aramaic and as ἀρχιερεύς καὶ συμποσιάρχης, archiereus kai symposiarches in Greek (passim in the various texts). This was evidently the leading figure of this priestly college. A number of the sources cited above refer only to him, not to the group as such. In addition, not all of them contain the qualification "of the priests of Bel". I agree with Kaizer 2002: 230-1 (on PAT 1128, found in the temple of Allat) that we can generally assume that every rb mrz mentioned in an inscription refers to the well-known leader of the priests of Bel. This also justifies the attribution of PAT 2036-2041 and Schmidt-Colinet 2013: 245-6 no. 13 (tesserae mentioning a rb mrz) to the priests of Bel (cf. Gawlikowski, who argues that these tesserae were issued by them). Milik 1972: 110 argues from the frequent attestation of the rb mrz / symposiarchos that he had authority over all the symposia of Palmyra. This is not necessary (at times, it may be merely a way of dating texts).

XII. NOTES

i. Comments	The priests of Bel are by far the most-attested organized group at Palmyra, and they are clearly not a private association. Their leader, the rb mrz, was one of the most important people in the city. In PAT 0265, the boule honours one of them with a statue, and IGLS XVII.1 351 shows that the position could be connected with the priesthood of the emperors.

XIII. EVALUATION

i. Private association

Discarded

Note

It would be of no help to try to understand this group in the terms of private associations. Of course, worship is attested (Bel, but also other gods). Of course, there were functionaries (PAT 1358 and 2812 mention "guards" - presumably of the temple). And there were obviously activities: the tesserae seem to show that the priests (who are sometimes represented in images on them) celebrated meals, and PAT 2743 honours a rb mrz□ because he provided the priests with good wine for a whole year (on debate over what is meant with "wine in skins, undiluted/unmixed", see Milik 1972: 153; Kaizer 2002: 190; Gawlikowski forthcoming). But all this is to be expected from the main priesthood of the city.
