XI INTERACTION

i. Local interaction In SEG 26: 614 the Aristiastai join the Aphrodisiastai (see CAPInv. 934) and the archers (see CAPInv. 932) to bury their common member Euklidas.

XII NOTES

i. Comments

The identity of the Aristiastai remains uncertain. Higgins 1986: fig. 55 (unpublished) offers an additional document to the dossier: another funerary stele set up by the Aristiastai for a male member confirming the restoration of an iota in SEG 26: 614. This rules out Aristaios as the eponymous for the association. Herkenrath (1906) and Fossey (1971) showed a preference for the goddess Ariste, or Ariste as an epithed for Demeter or Artemis. Schachter (1976) suggested the Aristiastai were called after ariston, a breakfast or midday meal. Roesch 1982: 124 suggested that the eponymous was a founder called Aristion, or Ariston. All these interpretations are well summarised by Pirenne-Delforge 1994: 288-9. Marchand (2015) explores the possibility that they derive their name from Aristeia. The absence of definite article between the Aristiastai and the Aphrodisiastai in SEG 26: 614 could perhaps indicate that they may have been one association. However, in the stele illustrated in Higgin's book they clearly bury one of their members by themselves. See Marchand (2015) for a discussion of this issue.

i. Private association Note Certain In SEG 26: 614 The Aristiastai join another private association, the Aphrodisiastai, to bury a common member, indicating that they were an organised body. Besides, the funerary formulae are those used by associations at Tanagra.
